At the Theatros.

Hay's "A Texas Steer" has been played so often in Richmond that it has about worn its welcome out. It is conceded by man to be the playwright's best production, and it certainly more nearly approaches a straight comedy than anything he ever wrote. Most theatre-goers, however have seen the piece several times, and know its lines and situations almost by heart. The company at the Academy was fairly good, and the audience seemed to enjoy the performance.

Mr. James R. McCann, as Mervin Brander, was not good in the earlier scenes, but in the third and last acts, while his work was better, he left very little of the Texas cattle King in his characterization, becoming it seemed a full-fledged Congressman. He was bound to have the "handle" that the slightest trace that he had ever lived on a ranch in a "five-room house." He seemed to have forgotten this fact, and his work in these two acts would not have seemed bad.

Mr. Harry Bernstein has proved himself a good manager, but Mr. Leath Brander, was not good in the earlier scenes, but in the third and last acts, while his work was better, he left very little of the Texas cattle King in his characterization, becoming it seemed a full-fledged Congressman. He was bound to have the "handle" that the slightest trace that he had ever lived on a ranch in a "five-room house." He seemed to have forgotten this fact, and his work in these two acts would not have seemed bad.
